Dolly the Cloned Sheep The New York Times

This e-single, a selection of articles from The New York Times, recounts the story of Dolly the sheep, the first cloned mammal. The female lamb was created by a team of scientists in Scotland, led by Dr. Ian Wilmut of the Roslin Institute and Dr. Keith Campbell of PPL Therapeutics.

The announcement of Dolly's cloning on Feb. 23, 1997, shocked the world, opening up a fierce debate on a range of ethical issues. The most troublesome question was: How would the technology be used, particularly regarding humans? In the scientific community, doubts even arose about the validity of the experiment, and a few leading biologists suspected that the whole thing was a hoax.

Dolly died in 2003 from a lung infection and in the years since there have been a few successes in cloning other species. On the whole, though, most efforts have had a high rate of failure. And human cloning has been banned in many states in the U.S. as well as in Canada and Australia.
